The Games We Play: Re-Writing the Rules of Organization?

Games are integral to Organization. We play games at Christmas parties, conduct strategy games and compete in league tables. Playful ceremonial events and the annual founder's day help forge Organizational culture and identity; joking rituals dissolve stress or initiate newcomers into work cultures; and office parties and sports competitions generate and resolve tensions, whilst also building trust and friendship beyond the workplace.

Work itself is often 'played' as a game and not least within our own academic profession! In our dominant economic system, the market is frequently presented as a big playfield, producing winners and losers, as well as cheats, chancers and spectators.

Sooner or later one realises it's impossible to think and study Organizations without taking account of games and play.

In Liverpool – a city defined by football rivalries, global music competitions and a thriving digital games industry – the conference will explore how games and play inform Organizational life, politics and practice:

- What are the games you find in the Organizations you study?
- What are the effects and affects of these games; what are their temporalities, their dramas and values?
- What are the possibilities and limits of theorising games and what are the spaces, roles and practices involved?
- Is there an institutional logic yet to be identified around games?
- What are the politics at play; who plays fair and who governs the rules of the game?
- And what are the stratagems, collaborations and paradoxes that keep us in the game or out?

Host

University of Liverpool Management School:
Learning to make a difference from an enterprising and vibrant world maritime city of culture.

Part of the prestigious Russell Group, the University of Liverpool is a research powerhouse with a proud civic mission to generate transformative knowledge that improves business and society, a vision closely aligned with EGOS values.

With 240 academic staff, a thriving doctoral community and strong international collaborations, over the last two decades, our Management School has established itself as a centre for impactful research in Organization studies, strategy and change.

We've hosted major international academic events, including the European Academy of Management and the British Academy of Management conferences, and the International Conference on Organizational Learning, Knowledge and Capabilities.

EGOS 2027 represents a natural continuation of our commitment to intellectual exchange, and is yet another opportunity to put into action our ambitious programme of social, environmental and economic change:

- Hybrid participation options to reduce travel emissions
- A vegetarian, locally sourced catering policy
- Careful consideration of venue selection and walkability.

Our city-centre campus is a 10-15 minute walk from Liverpool Lime Street Station and within easy reach of accommodation, restaurants and cultural landmarks.

It sits in the city's Knowledge Quarter, a hub of innovation, science and creativity – a fitting setting for critical debates about Organizations and society.

Most of the colloquium sessions will take place in newly refurbished lecture theatres and seminar rooms, all equipped with state-of-the-art hybrid facilities to support both in-person and virtual delegates.

Liverpool is a compact and welcoming city, so you'll find it easy to navigate on foot, by public transport or even by bicycle.
